The Two Goblins

By Ezekiah Butterworth

THERE comes a proud day in Indian summer to an old farm, a day of real importance. It is when the hen turkey returns to the home roosts and dooryard trees from the fields, bringing her flock with her.

This holiday parade takes place near "killing time." She approaches the farmstead slowly and cautiously, and if strutting is done the cock turkey does it in the sunny air. The fire of the sun seems falling in showers in those days. The air is indeed as bright as it used to be in summer time, but not quite so warm. The air is still and seems hollow, and occasionally a nervous wind from the north rustles the russet leaves.

That night she roosts her flock on the ridgepole of the cockloft or in one of the dooryard trees. The sun and moon seem the same on that glorious day.
The moon comes up over the sea like a night sun, golden and red, and the night turns into another day, not quite so warm as the sun days, but often very warm.

It was very warm on the night of which I have a story to tell. The place was a shipyard country house on the North river, where a fleet of ships had been built, and among them the Columbia, which was a wonder. It was that ship, commanded by Captain Kendrick, that discovered the Columbia river.

There had gone to work in that famous shipyard a giant of a man named Ruggles. He was a student of natural history, but he had never heard of how the turkeys came home in Indian summer. He swung his broadax high in the twelve or more hours of his toil, and when he slept it was as a giant sleeps.

The good woman of the thrifty farm kept boarders, and she had many now, as it was the high tide of the shipbuilding. When Mr. Ruggles came she knew not how to accommodate him; her beds were all full except one in a little room under the cockloft.

"You are a six footer," she said to the same Mr. Ruggles, "and something over. I have but one bed left, and that is one that the chore boy used to occupy, but you will have to make the best of it."

"And that I will," said the giant.
He did. He slept fairly well, for there was an east wind. That was the night before the hen turkey came home with all her feathery magnificence for Thanksgiving.

There was no east wind on the following night after the lady turkey's regimental return. The contented bird ordered her flock to roost on the ridge-pole over a little window under the eaves trough, which was bowered with woodbine turning red. The flock was so numerous that they crowded together and said "Quit!" to each other on getting settled into silence, but they were arranged in a row at last, and the world was silent.

Mr. Ruggles, of the long limbs, went to his room, unconscious of the company on the ridgepole. The night was very hot, and the good woman had left the window open, after brushing away the wasp nests and cobwebs.

"This is stifling," said he, after sinking down on his narrow bed. "I cannot stand this cramping bed. What will I do? I will put my feet out of the window. There is no one to know."

So he stretched his great feet and calves out of the window, wide apart under the eaves trough and cool woodbine, and gave a snore and was in oblivion.

The turkeys were fattening, and when the great sun-moon came up over the sea they became uncomfortable, and two young goblins put their heads down to look for a more easy adjustment, and there it was, handy as it could be—Mr. Ruggles' two feet and ample supports.

One of them stepped down very carefully and lighted upon Mr. Ruggles' leg, just above the foot, and gave a note of satisfaction. The other followed the example. Mr. Ruggles slept on, and the two goblins were soon asleep perched on his two legs and nestled close to his feet.

Of what Mr. Ruggles dreamed we cannot be sure, but early in the morning he thought he heard someone say, "Mr. Ruggles, Mr.
Ruggles!"

"They?"
The same voice said in a tone of surprise,
"Mr. Ruggles."
His personality easily changed the "Go" sound into "Ru."

Then another voice said in a tone of equal surprise, "Mr.
Ruggles." And Mr. Ruggles started and began to draw in his legs, when two goblins flew into the air. In relating this adventure he was asked how he knew that they were goblins.

"Because they both said so, all of themselves," said he. "But they found that they could not carry me away.
I was too much for them. What had I ever done to be visited by two evil spirits like that?"

Mr. Ruggles rose and put his head out of the window. He saw two turkeys on the ground. One of them looked up to the ridgepole and said, "Mr. Ruggles," or what sounded like it to suggestions of inner consciousness.

"They both appeared greatly surprised," said Mr. Ruggles. "They asked the same question as the goblins, only they clipped their words. I wonder if they saw the goblins fly away.
I will never put my two feet out of the window again."

And ever afterward the careful man swung high his broadax by day and

UNCLE SAM'S THANKSGIVING

In These Days It Covers Much of the Earth's Surface.

It must be remembered that the president's proclamation appointing a day of thank offering and praise to the Most High goes not only to the forty-five states and territories, but also to the new island dependencies of the republic—Porto Rico, Hawaii and the Philippines. The natives of these tropical climes take quite kindly to any sort of a holiday, especially a holiday that involves a feast, so that Thanksgiving is already popular among them.
Uncle Sam's national bird, the gobbler, is not well known to them yet, but it is quite probable that they will appreciate his highness when they are better acquainted with his succulent qualities.
There are enough native Americans in the various islands, including soldiers, merchants, officials, schoolteachers and the like, to see that the introduction is properly brought about.

Thanksgivings of the Revolution.

There were eight Thanksgiving days appointed by the Continental congress for observance among the colonies during the war for independence. After the one called for the purpose of celebrating the peace treaty, which was held in 1784, the day was allowed to lapse until 1789, when Washington took his seat as president. The idea in these early days was to offer thanks on some special occasion. That our ancestors could find eight such occasions during the dark days of the Revolution shows that they were ready to be thankful on somewhat slim provocation. But it also shows that the gobblers shed their blood for the country as well as the men.
